The Women's Liberation Movement was criticized by some feminists -- both black and white -- for its exclusion of nonwhite, working class women. Although the omission wasn't intentional, this fracture spurred the rise of black feminism. Since Women's Lib platforms focused solely on gender without the context of race and class, they weren't entirely relevant to all black women.

The feminist credo is that every woman in politics – regardless of her political position – has to be respected as a political being, as much as any male politician, and has to be held to the same standards, not higher and not lower. The feminist credo is also that every woman has the right to vote for whomever she wishes, even if it a racist, a misogynist or a crook (or all of the above).
