One! Hundred! Demons! interrogates the trope of resilience, and shows that neither children nor adults are exempt from any part of the human condition. Barry suggests that if contriving demons is an unavoidable part of rationalizing difficult emotions such as fear and anxiety, putting them down in images and words might slow their pursuit.

Hundred Demons generally focus on controlling the opponent's plays while pressuring them with damage, usually with cards that have high critical and burn damage. They do whatever it takes to destroy the opponent, even using their own cards as resources for their effects. A way they do this is by using monsters with higher than average stats and good field swarming abilities, creating a strong beatdowns field.

One Hundred Demons was hard to relate to because it lacked in the universal. Of everything. All topics from childhood for example were very specific to Barry as if a diary entry and I have hardly gone through any of the experiences she has. She had less of the philosophical "Why did we stop playing and became angry" wonderings which make me think and also stare at the page with my mouth gaping ...
