He argues that a global culture of architectural form can be identified with the bungalow, one which accords with the development of our international, capitalistic, and urban culture, and that the bungalow "was one of, if not the first, common house types of this culture." In turn, King demonstrates the bungalow's varied manifestations throughout the world: in North America, for example, the bungalow illustrates the relationship between ideology and environment, while in Britain we see the ...

Anthony King published The Bungalow: The Production of Global Culture in 1984. King combined an interdisciplinary approach with a transnational perspective, tracing the growth of the "bungalow" from its indigenous existence in India to the colonial appropriations by British imperialists in India and Africa to its North American counterparts ending with Australia's adoption. Moreover, like many other historians of the period, King discusses the bungalow in the context of cultural ...
